

SPECIFIC ADVICE FOR READING JOSHUA

You will notice that the story in Joshua is told from the perspective of a later time, as the narrator repeatedly mentions certain kinds of memorials that “are there to this day” (4:9; 5:9; 7:26; 8:28–29; 10:27), as are many of the Canaanite peoples (13:13; 15:63; 16:10). The former serve as reminders of God’s faithfulness in the past, the latter as reminders of what had not been done. Both the structure of the book and God’s opening words to Joshua (1:2–9) reveal the three major concerns.

First, there is the engagement in the holy war. Notice how the emphasis is always on God’s initiative and participation (“I will be with you,” 1:5). Thus the opening battle (Jericho) is God’s alone; after that, the Israelites are themselves militarily involved, but always with God fighting for them (8:1; 10:14; 23:10); as David would put it later, “the battle is the LORD’S” (1 Sam 17:47). This is God’s holy war, not just to give Israel the land, but especially to rid the land of idolatry (false gods)—all of this so that Yahweh will dwell as King among a people who are to reflect his likeness and follow his ways. In this regard be watching also for the several instances when the author speaks of the gift of “rest” following the holy war (Josh 1:13, 15; 14:15; 21:44; 22:4; 23:1), a theme picked up negatively in Psalm 95:11 regarding the wilderness generation and then in Hebrews 4:1–11 as warning and assurance.

Second, even though chapters 13–21 are not a good read as such, they are profoundly important to the story, for here at last is the fulfilling of God’s promise to Abraham and to his seed that they would one day inherit this very land. It was to be their special territory precisely so that here God could develop a people who, by honoring and serving Yahweh, would bless the nations. Third, and most important, everything has to do with the Israelites’ covenant loyalty to the one God. This is the key element in the opening address to Joshua (“Do not let this Book of the Law depart from your mouth; meditate on it day and night, so that you may be careful to do everything written in it,” 1:8). This is the central factor in the defeat at Ai (7:11, 15). It also accounts for the early insertion of the covenant renewal at Mount Ebal (8:30–35) and for the final covenant renewal at Shechem with which the narrative concludes (24:1–27). You will readily see how much all of this picks up and carries on the concerns of Deuteronomy: God’s war against false gods; God’s promise of the land; and the concern for loyalty to the one true God against all forms of idolatry.

Two further things might help you to read Joshua well. First, read with helpful maps in hand (such as those found in Marten Woudstra’s commentary on Joshua [see How to /, p. 269]). This will give you a good sense of the geography mentioned throughout. Second, it may help you to know that, at the time of Israel’s invasion, Canaan was not occupied by a superpower, as it had been earlier by the Egyptians and Hittites. Thus, Israel did not have to face that kind of powerful opposition. Rather, the land was organized in the form of city-states, so that each major city and its surrounding villages had its own king, each of whom was politically independent. Such an arrangement meant that the Israelites, though a small people themselves, could fight each state or small grouping of states (9:1–2; 10:5–27; 11:1–9) separately and thus gradually possess much of the land.
