

History of Designs

Textiles - the start of Industrial Design Protection

The first Act dealing with copyright in industrial designs was the Designing & Printing of Linen Act in 1787. This gave a very limited copyright protection to those who engaged in the "arts of designing and printing linens, cottons, calicos and muslin" and gave proprietors the sole right of printing and reprinting them for two months from the date of first publication, provided the name of the proprietor was marked on each piece. In 1794 the period of protection was extended to three months.

The Introduction of Registration

From 1839 a series of laws were passed, gradually extending the boundaries of design protection. The Copyright of Design Act 1839 considerably increased the protection afforded to fabrics by extending the law to fabrics composed of wool, silk or hair and to mixed fabrics made up of any two of the following materials: linen, cotton, wool, silk or hair.

The same Act extended protection far beyond the textile trade and gave us the foundations of modern design law. It gave protection to every new or original design including textiles. It also allowed protection for the ornamentation and for the shape and configuration of any article of manufacture.

This Act introduced a system of registration, a Registrar was appointed by the Board of Trade and unless a design was registered before it had been published, the benefits of the Act could not be obtained. This is still a central principle and differentiates a registered design from copyright in which rights automatically reside with the proprietor.

The Design Act 1842 consolidated all earlier Acts and further increased the remedies for infringement, it also divided the possible articles of manufacture and substances into classes. In 1843 this was amended to extend protection of the Act to designs composed of functional features. This meant that designs such as springs for a bicycle, an oil can and gas pilot light were then capable of registration. The roots of the current statement of novelty can be seen in a provision of the 1843 Act which allowed the Registrar of designs to require an applicant to submit a written description of the design. However this statement was the reverse of the present novelty statement, in that, the applicant was required to indicate which parts were not new.

The Designs Registry joins the UK Patent Office

In 1875 the powers and duties of the Board of Trade under the various Designs Acts were transferred to the UK Patent Office by the Copyright of Designs Act 1875, through the Designs Registry which still carries out the registration of designs. In 1883 a single consolidating and amending Act was passed embracing Designs, Patents and Trademarks (which had also joined the UK Patent Office).

From 1911-49 design registration was governed by the designs portion of the Patents & Designs Acts 1907-1946. In 1949 registered designs were once more separated entirely from patents and the law relating to registered designs was governed by the Registered Design Act 1949. The most important alterations in the law were the amendment of the definition of design and the abolition of classification, both of which materially affected the validity as well as the scope of many registered designs.

The Registered Designs Act 1949 is still in force today but as amended by the Copyright, Designs and Patents Act of 1988. The act was amended further on 9 December 2001 to incorporate the European Designs Directive. Future amendments and changes will be necessary to reflect the growing and changing needs of design protection.
